It is said that afternoon tea is a quintessential example of British traditions. We’d have to agree.

It all began when Anna Russell, the seventh Duchess of Bedford, complained of hunger pangs between meals, and often requested a pot of tea and a light snack in her private boudoir during the afternoon.

When she returned to London, she invited friends to join her for "tea and walking in the fields". Other social hostesses picked up on this and it soon became respectable to take tea and sandwiches in the drawing room, a room traditionally used in the 18th century for entertaining guests before dinner.
